

The relationship of wine to geology is not simple; other factors are also important in the production of wine. These include climate (water supply, insolation and temperature) and not least, the producer. The geology has an influence on water supply, indirectly on insolation (by its influence on topography) and trace elements in the soil. Much of what the French call 'terroir' is a mystique that is a combination of several of these factors.